

954
C329
bud

UC-NRLF

B 3 582 623

THE LIBRARY
OF
THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

GIFT OF
HORACE W. CARPENTIER

Ullanman

Recd May 31, 1911

THE BUDDHA

A DRAMA IN THREE ACTS AND FOUR INTERLUDES

BY

बुद्धं सरणं गच्छामि ।

धम्मं सरणं गच्छामि ।

संघं सरणं गच्छामि ॥

Chicago, U. S. A.

1911

THE BUDDHA

A DRAMA IN THREE ACTS AND FOUR INTERLUDES

BY PAUL CARUS

बुद्धं सरणं गच्छामि ।

धम्मं सरणं गच्छामि ।

संघं सरणं गच्छामि ॥

CHICAGO
THE OPEN COURT PUBLISHING CO.

1911

DIRECTIONS TO THE STAGE MANAGER.

The scenery can be made very attractive by both historical accuracy and a display of Oriental luxury, but the drama may easily be performed with simple means at a small cost without losing its dramatic effect. Some of the changes, however, should be very rapid. The interludes can be replaced by lantern slide pictures, or may be omitted.

If the interludes are retained there need not be any intermission in the whole drama.

The music for the Buddha's Hymn of Victory, pages 5 and 39 (see The Open Court, XIX, 49); the dirge on page 19, (Open Court, XIX, 567); Yasodhara's Song, page 37 (Open Court, XVIII, 625); and the Doxology, page 63 and at the end (Open Court, XVIII, 627), may be found in a collection entitled Buddhist Hymns (Chicago, Open Court Publishing Co., 1911).

COPYRIGHT BY
THE OPEN COURT PUBLISHING CO.

1911

CAST OF CHARACTERS.

All vowels to be pronounced as in Italian.

Siddhāttha Gótama, Prince of the Sakyas, later on the Buddha	B
Suddhōdana, King of the Sakyas, father of Siddhāttha.	S
Pajāpati, Queen of the Sakyas, aunt and stepmother of Siddhāttha	P
Princess Yasōdhara, Siddhāttha's wife	Y
Rāhula, Yasōdhara's son	R
Devadatta, brother of Yasodhara	Dd
Kāla Udāyin, the gardener's son	K
Gopa, Yasodhara's maid	G
Visākha, a Brahman, Prime Minister of Suddhōdana	V
Dēvala, a Sakya Captain	D
Bimbisara, King of Magadha	Bb
Ambapali, King Bimbisara's favorite	Ap
Nāgadēva, Prime Minister of Māgadha, leader of an embassy	N
Jēta, Prince of Northern Kosala	J
Anātha Pīndika, a wealthy man of Sāvāttha	A
Māra, the Evil One	M
Servants	St
Singers: Mara's Daughters, Angels, Brahma, Vishnu, Shiva.
Ministers, Officers, Soldiers.

GLOSSARY OF FOREIGN TERMS.

- Buddha, the Enlightened One, the Saviour.
- Bodhi, enlightenment or wisdom.
- Bodhisatta, a seeker of the bodhi, one who endeavors to become a Buddha.
- Bodhi tree, the tree under which Buddha acquires enlightenment.
- Muni, thinker or sage.
- Sakya-muni, the Sage of the Sakyas, the Buddha.

Tathāgata, a title of Buddha, which probably means "The Perfect One," or "he who has reached completion."

Nirvāna (in Pali, "Nibbana") eternal bliss.

Kapilavatthu, capital of the Sakyas.

Sāvātthi, capital of Northern Kōsala.

Jētavana, the pleasure garden of Prince Jēta at Savatthi.

Māgadha, a large kingdom in the Ganges Valley.

Rājagāha, capital of Magadha.

Uruvēla, a place near Benares.

Arāda and U'draka, two philosophers.

Indra, in the time of Buddha worshiped by the people as the most powerful god.

I'ssara, the Lord, a name of God Indra.

Yama, the god of death.

नमो तस्मै भगवतो अरुहते सम्मा सम्बुद्धस्य ।

ACT I.

FIRST SCENE.

[A tropical garden in Kapilavatthu, in the background mountains, at a distance the snow-capped peaks of the Himalayas. On the right near the front a marble bench surrounded with bushes. Further back the palace entrance of the Raja's residence. Above the entrance a balcony. On the left a fortified gate with a guard house; all built luxuriously in antique Indian style.]

[Present: SUDDHODANA, the king (S) ; PAJAPATI, the queen (P), and the minister of state VISAKHA (V)..]

S. My son Siddattha truly loves his wife,
And since their wedlock has been blessed by this
Sweet, promising, this hale and healthy child,
His melancholy will give way to joy,
And we reclaim his noble energies
To do good service for our race and state.
New int'rests and new duties give new courage
And thus this babe will prove his father's saviour
For he will tie his soul to life again.

P. I fear his grief lies deeper than you think.

S. What sayest thou, my trusty counselor?

V. This is the last hope which I have for him,
I followed your advice and tried all means

To cure Siddhattha of his pensive mood.
 I taught him all that will appeal to man:
 The sports of youth, the joy of poetry
 And art, the grandeur of our ancient lore,
 The pleasures e'en of wanton sense; but naught
 Would satisfy the yearnings of his heart.

- S. Yet for religion he shows interest:
 He ponders on the problems of the world.
- V. Indeed he ponders on life's meaning much,
 Investigates the origin of things
 But irreligious are his ways of thought.
 He shows no reverence for Issara,
 And Indra is to him a fairy tale.
 He grudgeth to the gods a sacrifice
 And sheddeth tears at immolated lambs.
 Oh no! he's not religious. If he were,
 His ills could easily be cured by faith,
 By confidence in Issara, the Lord.
- S. What then is your opinion of the case?
- V. Siddhattha is a youth of rarest worth,
 And he surpasseth men in every virtue
 Except in one.—He is too independent:
 He recognizeth no authority,
 Neither of men nor gods. He suffereth
 [more and more impressively]
 From the incurable disease of thought.
- S. Cure thought with thought, teach him philosophy,
 Show him the purpose of our holy writ.
 Instruct him in the meaning of the Vedas,
 Reveal to him their esoteric sense.

V. My lord, I did, but he is critical,
 He makes objections and will not believe.
 He raises questions which I cannot answer,
 And his conclusions are most dangerous.

P. It seems to me that you exaggerate ;
 Siddhattha is not dangerous. He is
 As gentle as my sister was, his mother,
 And almost overkind to every one.

V. I know, my gracious lady, but e'en kindness
 May harmful be, if it is out of place.

S. I see no danger in his gentle nature.

V. But he lacks strength, decision, warlike spirit.

S. That cometh with maturer years.

V. I doubt it:
 Your son, my Lord, not only hath no faith
 In holy writ, neither does he believe
 In caste-distinction, and he would upset
 The sanctioned order of our institutions.
 He would abolish sacrifice and holdeth
 The Brahman ritual in deep contempt.

S. Your words alarm me.

V. Rightly so: I fear
 That he will stir the people to rebellion ;
 But since a child is born to him, his mind
 May turn from dreams to practical affairs.
 There are some men who care not for themselves,
 Who scorn high caste, position, wealth and honor,
 So far as they themselves may be concerned,
 But they are anxious for their children's fortune,
 And so Siddhattha soon may change his views.

- S. Let us be patient for a while yet longer.
 Keep everything unpleasant out of sight,
 Invite him merry company. Remove His gloomy cousin Devadatta. He tries
 To reach a state of bliss by fasts,
 His very play is penance and contrition.
- P. Ananda is a better boon companion,
 He is not so morose as Devadatta.
- S. Neither is he the right friend for my son.
 I grant he has a loving disposition,
 But he is pensive too. Surround Siddhattha
 With lads such as the gardener's jolly son,
 Kala Udayin. Like a lark he warbles!
 Would there were more like him. He jokes and laughs
 And never makes a sullen face. But tell me
 How is to-day Kala Udayin's father?
- V. His sickness turns from bad to worse. I fear
 He cannot live.
- S. [with concern] Have him removed from here;
 Siddhattha likes him much and if he knew
 Udayin's sorry fate, it might undo
 All good effects of joyful fatherhood.
- V. The best will be to move him in the night.
- S. Move him by night, and do it soon.—But hush,
 Yasodhara is coming with her babe.
- [YASODHARA (Y) and two attendant maids, one carries an umbrella, shading the Princess; the other, GOPA
 (G), carries the infant.]

P. [meets her and kisses her.]

Welcome, thou sweetest flower of our garden,
Thou ray of sunshine in Siddhatta's life.

S. My dearest daughter! how is Rahula?

Y. My royal father, Rahula is growing,
And he increases daily in his weight;
To-day he smiled at me most cunningly.
I'll lay him down, for he is fast asleep.

[All enter the palace. The stage remains empty a moment. Soft, serious music (Buddha's "Hymn of Victory") is heard.]

SECOND SCENE.

[SIDDHATTHA (B) and KALA UDAYIN (K) enter.]

K. My sweet Prince, when you are king you must appoint me court jester. Will you, my good Lord? We two are good contrasts: You full of dignity upon a royal throne, a golden crown upon your head, the scepter in your hand, and I dressed in motley with cap and bells. Heigh ho! That will be jolly. And after all we are so much alike!

B. A royal crown shall never grace my head.

K. And why should it not, sweet Prince?

B. I have a higher aim, a greater mission. What is a kingdom? What are wealth and power? What crown and scepter? They are transient things, I yearn for the Immortal state, Nirvana.

K. Then wilt thou be a Buddha. Oh, even then will I follow thee. [He kneels down with clasped hands.]

Wilt thou a holy Buddha be,
 O keep me in thy company
 Though I'm a jester. I'll be good.
 Let me attain beatitude.

B. Rise Kala, rise, I am a mortal man,
 I'm not omniscient, nor have I yet
 Attained the goal of goals, enlightenment.—
 Tell me, why dost thou think we are alike?

K. My Lord, you have no ambition to be a king; you think the world is full of vanity, and you consider that life and its glory will pass away. That is exactly what I think. I agree with you. Only, you are of a serious disposition and take the matter to heart, while I think it is great fun. What is the use of thinking so much. We are all like bubbles: we float in the air, and then the bubble bursts and this life is over. I am now a poor boy. I fear no change. In a future incarnation I may be born as the son of a king, like you. And think of it, after a few million years, this whole world, this big bulky stupid institution, this home of so many villains, and a couple of good ones like us two among them, the theater of rascalities, of vanities, of follies, will be scattered to the winds, as if it had never existed. Be merry, my Prince, so long as the comedy lasts.

[DEVADATTA (Dd.) appears in the background. His cheeks are sunken and his face is gloomy. His eye has a fanatic expression.]

B. Consider, it may prove a tragedy.

K. Let it be what it may be. To me it will be what I think it is. It is a huge joke.

B. But who will laugh at it, my friend?

K. I will.

B. Kala, the time will come when thou wilt weep.

K. Well then? And if I weep I shall shed tears.
Tears are a sweet relief
In anguish pain and grief.
I'll make the best of all,
Whatever may befall.

B. Thy prattle seemeth foolish, but it hideth
A deep philosophy.

K. Why then, good Lord,
Why wilt thou not its merry lesson learn?

B. Good Kala listen, and thou'lt understand:
There is a difference between our aims:
Thou clingest to this world of transiency,
But I seek the Etern. Thou seest not
The misery of life, for thou art happy—
Happy at least at present, though the next
Moment may find thee writhing in lament.
I seek a place of refuge whence I can Extend my hand to help those in distress.
I will attain the state of Buddhahood
To bring deliverance to all mankind.

Dd. Why do you waste your time, Siddhattha, with this frivolous lad? What profit can there be in gossip such as you two carry on?

K. You always scold, you hollow-eyed sour face! You always moralize. Even your good brother-in-law is too worldly for you.

Dd. I did not speak to you, I addressed myself to Siddhattha.

B. Udayin has a heart, a human heart,
And all my sympathy goes out to him.

Dd. If you intend to lead a religious life and go into homelessness, you had better devote yourself to fasts and contemplations.

K. You do not talk to me, but I will talk to you, and I will tell you that in all your religious exercises you think of yourself, while Siddhattha thinks of others. I wish you would go into homelessness. Nobody would miss you here.

[Addressing himself to Siddhattha]

K. But, good my Lord, you must not go into homelessness, because you will do more harm than good.

B. How can that be, my good Kala Udayin?

K. There comes your noble wife, Yasodhara.

[YASODHARA comes, her maids with umbrellas keep at a respectful distance.]

Y. Come see our boy, he is a lovely child;
He just woke up. He maketh you forget,
The sad thoughts of your heart on world and life,
For he, the darling babe, is life himself.

[Kala flirts with Gopa, one of Y's maids.]

B. I'll follow thee at once.

Y. [Addressing Devadatta]

And brother, will you come along?

Dd.

Not I.

This child is but the beginning of new misery. It continues the old error in the eternal round on the wheel of life.

[She goes into the house. Devadatta withdraws into the garden.]

B.

Now Kala speak.

K. O Prince Siddhattha, do not go into homelessness, do not leave us. I cannot live without you. You are my comfort, my teacher, my guide. I do not follow your instructions, but I love to hear them. Oh I could not live without you. Do not go, sweet Prince. Think of your wife, your dear good lovely wife, it will break her heart. Think of your child, Do not go, noble Prince. Let somebody else become the saviour of the world. Somebody else can just as well become the deliverer and the Buddha. I am sure there are many who would like to fill that place, and somebody can do it who has a less comfortable home to leave, who has a less lovely wife, who is not heir to a kingdom, and who has not such a sweet promising little boy as you have. I cannot live without you.

B. Wouldst thou go with me?

K. [kneels]

Yes my Lord, I would.

Take me along and I will cheer you up.

B. Wouldst thou go begging food from house to house, With bowl in hand, a homeless mendicant?

K. No sir, that would not suit me.

B. Wouldst thou by night sleep under forest trees?

K. No sir, I would catch cold. That's not for me.
 [Rises] If you needs must go, sir, you had better go alone. That life is not for me. I will go and hear the nightingale.

[SIDDHATTHA follows the Princess into the palace.]

K. A Buddha's life
 Is not for every one.
 He has no wife
 No pleasure and no fun.
 He cannot laugh,
 He cannot cry;
 He cannot love
 He cannot sigh.
 He's always preaching, preaching,
 He's always teaching, teaching.
 He wonders at time's transiency
 And ponders on man's misery,
 And findeth his salvation
 In dreary resignation.
 That life I see
 Is not for me:
 T'would be ill spent;
 I would not find enlightenment.
 I lift not the world's woe
 And in my quest for truth would fail
 [Muses a moment]
 So I had better go
 And listen to the nightingale.

[Kala Udayin exit.]

[During the last scene twilight has gradually set in.]

THIRD SCENE.

]The scene changes by open curtain. A veil comes down, and when it goes up again we see the bed chamber of Siddhattha and Yasodhara dimly lit by tapers.]

[Yasodhara (Y) on the bed with babe in arms, two maids in waiting. Siddhattha (B) comes in. A halo of light (not too strong) surrounds his head. The Princess rises, lays the babe down and advances toward her husband.]

Y. O good my Lord, my Prince, my Husband!

[A pause. She changes her voice as if ashamed of her show of feeling. With a matter-of-fact intonation]

Rahula fell asleep again.

B. Why art thou sad, my good Yasodhara?

I see a tear that glitters in thine eye.

Y. An unspeakable melancholy steals over my soul when I hear you speak of your religious longings.

B. Wouldest thou not rejoice if I fulfilled
My mission; if I reached the highest goal?

Y. Oh! Siddhattha! you do not love me.

B. My heart embraces all the world—and thee.

Y. If you loved me truly, there would not be much room for all the world. You think of the world all day long, and have not a minute's time for your wife.

B. I have, my dear!

Y. My noble Husband!

B. Speak!

- Y.* Scarcely do I dare to call you by that name. You are kind and gentle, but for a husband you are too lofty, too distant in your dignity. It may be wrong in me, it may be sinful, but I wish you were less lofty and more loving.
- B.* My dearest "Wife," I call thee so on purpose—
My dearest "Wife," thou dost not understand:
The misery and ills of all the world
Weigh heavy on my heart. I'll find no peace
Until at last a remedy be found.
- Y.* Why dost thou trouble about others? Think of thy son, thy sweetest Rahula, and if thou lovest me a little only, think of me.
- B.* I think of thee, my loving Wife, but when I think of thee I think of all—of all
The loving wives, the happy trembling mothers
All over in the world. Happy they are,
But trembling for their babes. Oh! bear in mind,
We all are in the net of sorrow caught.
This world is full of pain, disease and death;
And even death brings no relief. Because
The wheel of life rolls on. The ills continue
In births that constantly repeat themselves.
- Y.* Oh! do not speak of it my Lord, it makes me sad. Why do you think of misery, while here we are surrounded by wealth and comfort, and even the prospects of our future are most auspicious. Why borrow trouble before it comes?
- B.* My dear Yasodhara, change is the law
Of being. Now we prosper, but the wheel
Goes round and brings the high into the dust.

Y. You suffer from bad dreams ;

B. Listen to me.

[They sit down.]

In this luxurious palace and these gardens,
Surrounding it, was I brought up with care.
I saw naught but the fair, the beautiful,
The pleasant side of life.

Y. I know, Siddhattha—
I know it very well.

B. You know, my father
Has kept me ignorant of evil things.
I might have thought that such is life throughout,
But I began to doubt and asked for leave
To see the world outside these palace walls.
Not without difficulty did I gain
Permission, and with Channa in a chariot
I drove away—when suddenly before me
I saw a sight I'd never seen before.
There was a man with wrinkled face, bleared eyes,
And stooping gait, a sight most pitiable.

[Yasodhara is much moved.]

While I was horror-struck, Channa passed by Indifferent, for he had seen such men.
Too well he knew the common fate of all ;
But I, the first time in my life, did learn
That, if we but live long enough, we all
Shall be such miserable wretched dotards.

Y. Too sudden came this saddening truth to you.

B. Channa sped on his horses out of town,
But there again! what an ungainly sight!

A man lay on the road-side, weak and helpless,
 With trembling frame and feverish cramps.
 I shut mine eyes to so much aching pain,
 Still I could hear his groaning and his moaning.
 "Oh, Channa," said I to the charioteer:
 "Why does this happen? How deserves this man
 The wretchedness of his great agonies?"
 "How do I know?" said Channa, "for we all
 Are subject to distemper and disease.
 Sometimes the best are stricken—and must die!"
 "Must die?" cried I, "What does that word portend?"

For, you must know, I never heard of death.
 My father had forbidden, at his court
 To speak to me of anything unpleasant.
 "Yea die!" said Channa, "Look around and see!"
 Along the road a funeral procession
 Moved slowly, solemnly and mournfully
 And on the bier a corpse, stark, stiff and cold.

- Y.* Do not be troubled, death is still far off.
- B.* Oh do not feel secure, for the three evils
 Surround us constantly and everywhere,
 And even now death hovers o'er our house.
 When I was born my mother went to heaven,
 Which means, she died when she gave life to me.
- Y.* My Lord don't think of evils that are past.
- B.* The world's impermanence is still the same,
 And all material things are conformations
 Subject to pain, decay and dissolution.
 Yet unconcerned in blessed carelessness
 Man hunteth after pleasure. Transiency

B. Yasodhara, a higher duty calls.

The time will come, and it is close at hand,
When I shall wander into homelessness.

I'll leave this palace and its splendid gardens

I'll leave the pleasures of this world behind

To go in quest of Truth, of saving Truth.

[Yasodhara sinks on her knees before him and clasps his knees.]

Y. And me, my Lord, thy quest will make a widow!

Oh, stay, and build thee here a happy home.

B. My dear Yasodhara, it cannot be.

[The Prince stands lost in thought. Rahula is restless, Yasodhara rises and turns toward the child.]

Y. He wakes again. I come, my babe, I come.

[The veil comes down again, and when it rises it shows the garden before the palace as in the first scene, but it is night and all is wrapped in darkness.]

FOURTH SCENE.

[King SUDDHODANA (S) and his minister VISAKHA (V) come out of the entrance. Later on Captain DEVALA (D) and soldiers.]

S. Unfortunate, most unfortunate, that Udayin died. Siddhattha will miss the gardener and will ask for him.

V. The Prince loves flowers, and he knows them all by name; he loves trees and shrubs, and praises them for yielding fruit and grain for feeding us without the need of shedding blood.

S. Have the body removed so long as it is dark.

V. The moon is full to-day and must rise in a little while.

S. Double the guards at the gate. I am afraid my son will flee. It would be a disgrace on my house to have him become a mendicant. The kings of Kosala, of Magadha, and all the others look with envy on our sturdy people; they dislike our free institutions and our warlike spirit. They would scoff at us if a Sakya prince had become a monk. But if Siddhattha does flee, I swear by Lord Indra that I shall disown him; I will no longer recognize him as my son. I will disinherit him and make Rahula my heir apparent.

[V. looks at S. in amazement.]

S. I am serious and I will do it. I swore an oath, and Issara will help me to keep it. Now go to the captain of the guards and do as I bade you.

[Exit. The Minister alone.]

V. Oh! What a chance for me! Siddhattha will flee, if he be not prevented; he will be disinherited. Rahula is a babe, and it will take twenty years before he grows up to manhood.—[He muses.] I may proceed on different lines, and one of them must certainly lead to success. I may marry the Princess and become the stepfather of the heir apparent, his guardian, the man who has him in his power—Hm! Hm! I need not plan too far ahead. And if that plan did not work, the King of Magadha would make me raja of the Sakyas, if I would recognize him as my liege. [The full moon rises and the scene becomes gradually brighter. V. knocks at the gate] Who is on guard?

[Officer comes out.]

D. I am, my Lord, 't is Captain Devala.

V. 'T is well. King Suddhodana requests you to double your guard to-night, for he has reasons. Further he wants you to remove the corpse of Udayin, the gardener who died to-day of an infectious disease. Be on your guard, for where a dead body lies there are ghosts—and [in a half whisper] when you see demons or gods, keep yourselves, you and your men, locked up in the guard house, and the spook will pass without harm.

D. Your order shall be punctiliously obeyed. [Pays his military salute and returns to the guard house.]

V. That settles the guard, and should Siddhattha flee he will find no obstacle.

[Two men come out of the guard house and enter the palace with a bier. KALA UDAYIN comes back from the garden. VISAKHA retires into the background.]

K. The nightingale is a sweet bird, but I like the lark better. The nightingale is more artistic, but his song is melancholy, he is so sentimental! The lark has a mere twitter like my own song, I like the lark better. How beautiful is this summer night; How glorious is the moon; how fragrant are the roses in the garden! It is a most auspicious night, and all breathes happiness.

[Visakha from his hiding place watches Kala.]

V. He comes in time, his presence will prosper my plans.

[Music, from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, somber and as if coming from a distance, is heard.]

[Kala, lost in thought, suddenly grows pensive.]

K. [while the music plays] What a strange presentiment is stealing over my soul. Perhaps I was too happy! What does Siddhattha say?

“All conformations always are transient,
Harrassed by sorrow, lacking a self.”

[The men come with the corpse on the bier. Kala stops them.]

K. What do you carry? Who is this? [he shrieks] My father! [The carriers set the corpse down and Kala sinks down by the bier.] Oh, my father! my dearest father! How did you die? Why did you leave me? Oh, my father! [he sobs].

[The moon goes for a while behind a cloud. Siddhattha comes.]

B. What may the trouble be? I heard a shriek.

[Kala rises. The scene is bright again.]

K. Oh, my Prince! See here! My father is dead! Now I know the truth as well as you. Now I feel the pain. The time has come for me to lament. I was so happy and I would not believe you.—Oh ye who are happy, think in the hour of happiness that all is subject to suffering, and the hour of suffering will come to you too. Nay more than that, the hour of death will come; it has come to my father, it will come to you and to me, and then my caroling will stop for ever. Oh, my poor father!

B. How rarely is thy advent welcome, Death,
 E'en this poor gardener who a servant was
 His livelong days, leaves in our hearts a gap.
 His son lamenteth him, and I not less;
 He was my loving friend, my educator,
 He had me on his knees so many a time,
 To tell me how the flowers will grow and blow,
 And how they prosper after rainy days.
 May gentle lilies from thy ashes spring,
 Decked with the purity of thine own heart,
 And with their fragrance give the same delight
 That in thy present life thou gavest us.

[The carriers lift up the body and carry it out.]

Oh, fare thee well, thou good and worthy friend,
 Oh, fare thee well, but thy departure is
 To me a token that my time has come.

[Turning to Kala who all the while was lying prostrate weeping]

Weep not, companion of my childhood days,
 But bear in mind the courage of thy mirth.
 Remember all the virtues of thy father
 And let them live again in thine own heart.
 Thou must not yield to weakness and lamenting,
 Tend to life's duties: Go and call me Channa,
 Bid him to saddle Kanthaka, my steed,
 And let him ready be for a night's ride.

[Kala exit. Siddhattha alone.]

The hour has come! and now my last farewell
 To thee my wife and Rahula my son.

[B. makes a few steps and halts.]

This is the greatest sacrifice I bring:
 I leave behind a crown without regret;
 I leave the luxury of wealth and power;
 I care for them as though they were but ashes.
 But I must also leave my wife and child:
 Here I must prove the courage of my heart.

[Enters the house.]

FIFTH SCENE.

[The veil of clouds comes down, and when it rises we see Yasodhara's bedroom again.]

[SIDDHATTHA (B) enters. YASODHARA (Y) sleeps with the babe in her arms.]

B. Here lie the rarest treasures of this life,
 My noble wife, my dear boy Rahula.

[Siddhattha approaches the bed.]

Your sleep is sweet in your sweet innocence,
 And I will not disturb your blissful rest.

I will go out in search for saving Truth
 And shall not come again unless 't be found.

Farewell my wife and Rahula my son.

Must I be gone? Is this, in sooth, my duty?

[He goes toward the door. There he stops.]

Perchance on their account I ought to stay.

But no! my father can take care of them.

It is my tender heart that makes me weak.

This is the greatest sacrifice I bring.

SIXTH SCENE.

[Change of scene, as rapid as before. The garden before the palace.]

Channa. My Prince, here is your steed!

[MARA (M), a superhuman figure, gaudily dressed, hovering in the air, suddenly appears and addresses Siddhattha (B).]

M. It is a shame to leave your wife and child.

B. [Addressing the vision in the air.]

Mara, thou here? thou wicked one, thou tempter!

K. Oh do not leave us Prince. Think of the wrong you do.

You wrong your royal father, you wrong your wife,
you wrong your child.

B. What sayest thou? Thou sayest I do wrong?

The same rebuke is echoed in my heart;

It is so sweet, so loving, so alluring!

And shall I listen to its tender voice?

How pleasant would it be to stay at home,

And to enjoy my wife's love and my child's!

Is that my duty? Say, is that my duty?

K. Surely my Lord, your duties lie at home.

[Siddhattha wavers as if in doubt. He stands pondering for a moment.]

B. Who will instruct me where my duty lies?

M. I will instruct thee, I will guide thee right.

K. How can you doubt, my Prince? And can you not

Search for the truth here in this pleasant garden?

There're spots enough where you can think, and ponder,

And meditate among the fragrant flowers.

B. Here I shall never reach my goal.

K.

Stay here.

A kingdom is your sure inheritance,
While Buddhahood is but a doubtful prize.

B. And shall the world wait for another Buddha?
So many millions clamor for the truth!

[with determination]

I hear the call and naught shall hold me back.
I see my duty and I will obey.

M. Wilt thou not stay, my noble Prince Siddhattha?
The wheel of empire turns, and thee I shall Make king of kings to rule the whole broad earth.
Think of the good which thou wilt do as king!
And then as king of kings thy mighty power
Will spread the good religion o'er the world.

B. I know thee Mara, tempter, Evil One,
Prince of this world, I know thy voice, thy meaning.
The gifts thou offerest are transient treasures,
And thy dominion is mere vanity.
I go to found a kingdom in the realm
Of the immortal state which lasts for aye.
Thou hinderest and dost not help the truth.

K. Thou speakest to the empty air, my Prince,
For I see no one whom thou thus addressest.

[Channa helps Siddhattha to mount, and while the gate opens leads the horse out of the gate, and Kala enters into the palace. Visakha is coming to the front.]

V. He is gone. He has made room for me. The time will come when this kingdom will be mine.

Y. [from the balcony] Siddhattha! Siddhattha! Where are you? He is gone! He has departed into homelessness! [She faints.]

[Curtain.]

FIRST INTERLUDE.

Living pictures accompanied by appropriate music, as an introduction to Act II.

1. BEGGING FOOD.

A scene of the Prince's life as a mendicant friar.

A Hindu village. Siddhattha stands bowl in hand before a hut; a woman dishes some rice from a kettle into his bowl; villagers, including children, stand around gazing at him,—a few with clasped hands.

2. THE KING GREETES THE MENDICANT.

Tradition tells that King Bimbisara, hearing of the noble monk, went out to see him and offered him to take part in the government. This being refused, the King requested him to visit Rajagaha, the royal residence, as soon as Siddhattha had become a Buddha.

Siddhattha is seated under a tree near a brook; the king stands before him, surrounded by his retinue.

3. PREACHING TO THE VILLAGERS.

Under the tree in the market place of a Hindu village. The Buddha is seated in the attitude of a preacher. The villagers stand or squat around intently listening.

4. SAVED FROM STARVATION.

In company with other monks, Siddhattha sought for a while enlightenment by self-mortification.

Being exhausted by severe fasts, the mendicant faints, and Nanda, the shepherd's daughter, passing by, refreshes him with rice milk. His five disciples at a distance fear that he has given up his quest for truth.

सुखो बुद्धानं उप्पादो सुखा सद्दम्मदेसना ।
सुखा सङ्गस्स सामग्गि समग्गानं तपो सुखो ॥ १ ६ ॥

ACT II.

FIRST SCENE.

[Seven years have elapsed since the first act. The garden before the palace of King SUDDHODANA as in Act I.]

[Present: YASODHARA (Y) with her maid GOPA (G) and RAHULA (R).]

Y. Repeat that verse once more and then we will stop our lesson.

R. With goodness meet an evil deed,
With loving kindness conquer wrath,
With generosity quench greed,
And lies by walking on truth's path.

Y. Now you can run about in the garden or play with the Captain's son.

R. Mother, I do not believe that goodness always works in this life.

Y. Why do you think so?

R. Because there are very bad boys, so bad that only a whipping will cure them.

Y. Rahula!

R. Truly, mother, truly. Even the gardener says so.

Y. You must set the bad boys a good example.

R. No use, mother; they remain bad. I have tried it.

Y. You must have patience.

R. No use, mother; and the gardener says, A viper remains a viper.

Y. Even poisonous reptiles can be tamed.

R. Yes, but the gardener first pulls their fangs. Would you like me to play with a viper?

Y. No, my boy.

[Excitement at the gate.]

R. What is going on?—O Mother! Kala Udayin is back!

[Kala Udayin (K) appears among the guards. Rahula runs to the gate.]

R. Kala! Welcome home! Shake hands!

K. Be heartily greeted, my boy.

R. Did you see father?

K. I did, Rahula.

R. Tell me all.

K. I will tell mother.

R. Come to mother. She has been expecting you for many days.

[Kala kneels to the Princess.]

Y. Gopa, take his bundle. [The maid takes his bundle and carries it into the house.] What news do you bring of Prince Siddhattha?

K. I followed the Prince from place to place and saw him last near Benares in the forest of Uruvela.

Y. How is his health, and will he come back?

K. His health is probably good, but he does not think of coming back—not yet. O my dear lady! If you could see him! he is as thin as a skeleton. I could count all his ribs.

R. What is the trouble with father?

K. He is fasting. He lives on a hempcorn a day; think of it, one little hempcorn a day!

Y. Oh, he will die! My poor husband. I must follow him and tend to his wants. He needs his wife's loving care. I will leave my home and follow him.

K. Could you help him, princess? He might not like it, and the monks abhor women. Moreover, I was told that he takes food again, every morning a cup of rice milk. The day I left he looked better. Still he was pretty pale.

Y. Tell me all you know of him.

K. I went first to Rajagaha, and there I heard wondrous tales about the noble monk Gotama. All the people knew about him, they called him a "sage" or "muni" and the "Bodhisatta."

R. What does that mean, Kala?

K. Bodhisatta is the man who seeks the bodhi—and the bodhi is enlightenment or Buddhahood.

Y. What did the people of Rajagaha say?

K. When Prince Siddhattha came to Rajagaha, he created a great excitement in the city. Never had been seen a mendicant of such noble appearance, and crowds flocked to him. They thought he was a Buddha and greeted him as a Buddha; but he said to them "I am not a Buddha; I am a Bodhisatta, I seek Buddhahood, and I am determined to find it.

Y. Did you meet people who saw him?

K. Indeed, I did. They say he looked like a god. The news spread all over the capital, and King Bimbisara himself went out with his ministers to see the Bodhisatta. King Bimbisara came to the place where the stranger stayed—under a forest tree near a brook—and greeted him most respectfully saying, "Great monk, remain here with me in Rajagaha; I see that you are wise and worthy. Live with me at the royal palace. Be my adviser and counselor. You are not made for a mendicant. Your hands are fit to hold the reins of empire. Stay here, I beg you, and you shall not lack honor and rank." "Nay," replied Siddhattha, "let me go my way in quest of enlightenment. I am bent on solving the problem of existence, and I will become a Buddha." Said the King, "Hear then, great monk. Go in quest of enlightenment, and when you have found it come back to Rajagaha."

Y. Is King Bimbisara so religious?

K. King Bimbisara is ambitious. As is well known, he is a warrior and a conqueror; but that is not all. He wants to be the greatest monarch of all ages and he would have all the great events happen under his rule. This is what he said to the Bodhi-satta: "When I was a youth I uttered five wishes, and they were these: I prayed, May I be crowned King. This wish has been fulfilled. Then I wished, May the holy Buddha, the Blessed One, appear on earth while I am King, and may he come to my kingdom. This was my second wish, and while I gaze upon you I know that it will be fulfilled. Further I wished, May I see the blessed Buddha and pay my respects to him. This was my third wish. My fourth wish was, May the Blessed One preach the doctrine to me, and my fifth and greatest wish was this, May I understand the doctrine. I beg you, therefore, great monk, when you have become a Buddha come back and preach the doctrine to me and accept me as your disciple."

Y. And whither did Siddhattha go from Rajagaha?

K. He visited the great philosophers Arada and Ud-raka, but he found no satisfaction in their theories. So he went on to Uruvela where the ascetics live. I followed the Bodhisatta and learned that he stayed with five disciples in the forest. I found shelter near by in the cottage of the chief shepherd, a good old man with a pretty daughter, Nanda. There I watched Siddhattha and his disciples from a distance. He was the youngest but the wisest of them, and they revered him as master. He outdid them all in fasting. One day Nanda, the shepherd's daughter, saw him faint, and he might have died from exhaustion right on the spot if Nanda had not given him rice milk to drink.

Y. O good Kala, what shall I do? What shall I do? Here I sit at home, a poor, helpless woman, unable to assist him or to take care of him! O Kala, advise me, what can I do?

[King Suddhodana (S) and Visaka (V) come out of the palace. The Princess retires into the palace. Gopa hides behind the bushes.]

S. I am glad to see you back. Have seen my son?

K. I have sire.

S. Where did you find him?

K. At Uruvela, the place of mortification where saints try to see visions and reach a state of bliss.

V. And has Siddhattha succeeded?

K. It does not seem so; he is starving himself to death.

V. Is he dying?

K. Not exactly, but I do not see how he can live—on that diet.

S. Oh, Visakha, how have I been deprived of my son through a whim!

[Both return into the palace. Visakha comes back.]

V. It seems that Siddhattha is ruining himself.

K. At the rate he is going now, he won't stand it long. He may not live another month. It is pitiable. You should have seen him. That beautiful young man looks like a consumptive in his last stage. I did not dare to tell what I thought. The Princess would not have borne the sad news.

V. Too bad. It looks pretty hopeless.

- K. I do not see how the Prince can survive.
- V. What is the idea of these fasts?
- K. These pious recluses believe that the self is imprisoned in the body and that the senses are the prison gates. They want to liberate the soul, and many of them behold visions, but Siddhattha seems to doubt whether the saints of Uruvela proceed on the right track. Indeed he denies the very existence of the self.
- V. I know he does. His views should be branded as purely human wisdom. As the senses are finger touch, eye touch, ear touch, nose and tongue touch, so the mind is to him mere thought touch. He claimed that the mind originates through a cooperation of the senses.
- K. His disciples begin to break away from him.
- V. That is right. They ought to have done so long ago. I always said that Siddhattha is an unbeliever. He spurns faith and relies too much on his own observation and reasoning. He will never find enlightenment. He is too negative, too nihilistic, and his quest of Buddhahood will end in a lamentable failure.
- K. It would be a pity, sir. He is certainly in earnest to find the truth—the real truth, not what the priests say nor the Vedas declare, but the truth, provable truth.
- V. Yes that is his fault. When the king speaks with you, tell him all, explain the hopelessness of his situation. The king ought to know the facts.

[Visakha retires into the palace.]

K. [Calls in a low voice] Gopa, Gopa!

[Gopa appears from behind the bush.]

K. [Aside] I knew she would not be far.

G. What do you want?

K. I want to have a talk with you.

G. Well?

K. Let us set our marriage day.

G. I do not care to marry you—just yet.

K. I want a kiss, Gopa.

G. You shan't have it!

K. I will leave Kapilavatthu and go back to the Bodhi-satta.

G. He will tell you that a youth must not kiss a girl.

K. That rule holds only for monks.

G. Go and turn monk. Then it applies to you.

K. The world would die out if everybody turned monk.

G. First, you are not everybody, and secondly, would it not be a blessing if the whole world would try to be sanctified?

K. Pshaw! Mankind consists of different castes and professions, of soldiers and merchants, of peasants and artisans and teachers. Mankind is like a body with various limbs, a head and hands, feet and chest and neck. A man who were head only could not live, and if mankind consisted of Buddhas only we would starve. We need a Buddha, but there must also be householders. Now quick give me a kiss.

[She pouts.]

K. If you do not kiss me I shall go back to the forest of Uruvela. Nanda, the shepherd's daughter is a very pretty girl. She is as pretty as you are. She is,—well her cheeks are rosier than yours. She is a little taller, and she is so graceful when she milks the kine. The shepherd needs a helper. I am sure he would like to have a son-in-law.

[Rahula enters.]

R. Gopa! Mother wants you.

G. [Kisses K. quickly] Here is a kiss, but you must forget Nanda. [Runs away.]

K. Stay a moment longer!

G. I have no time. [Exit.]

K. I knew she would come round,—and she is much prettier than Nanda. Nanda is a buxom country lass, a pleasant girl, but Gopa is as proper as a princess. [He continues with unction.] Bodhisatta longs for the blessed state of Nirvana, and when he has found it, he will be calm and without passion. He will walk on earth as a god among men. No emotion will disturb the peace of his mind, and the happiness of the great Brahma will be as nothing in comparison to the infinite bliss of his Buddhahood. [With a lighter tone]: I adore him, but I do not envy him. I do not long for the happiness of a god. I am a man with human faults and human yearnings. I am satisfied with the happiness and the sufferings of a man. Since I am assured of Gopa's love, I care not for Nirvana. I think that this world is good enough for me.

[Curtain.]

SECOND SCENE.

[YASODHARA'S bedroom. All luxury has been removed; she sleeps on a mat on the floor, RAHULA in bed.]

R. Mother! Mother!

Y. Sleep my boy, it is almost midnight.

R. Take me up, Mother.

[Y. picks R. up.]

R. Why do you sleep on the floor, mother?

Y. Because father does so. Let me lay you down on your couch, you must sleep.

R. Tell me more of father.

Y. I will to-morrow.

R. Tell me now. Is father a king?

Y. No my son. But he is going to found a kingdom.

R. Will he be king of it?

Y. I do not know, my boy, but his kingdom will not be like other kingdoms. It will be the kingdom of truth—a spiritual kingdom, a kingdom of righteousness.

R. Is father rich?

Y. He scorns riches.

R. Why does he?

Y. He seeks other riches, the riches of religion, of the mind, of spirit.

R. Did he find them?

Y. I believe he did.

R. He sends you news through Kala Udayin.

Y. No Rahula, I send Kala Udayin out to watch him and when Kala comes back he tells me what he saw and heard. Kala does not speak to father.

R. Why does Kala not speak to father?

Y. Grandfather forbade him. When we sent out Devadatta and Ananda, they became attached to the life of a hermit. They joined father and did not come back; but Kala will not turn monk.

R. But this time he will speak to father.

Y. How do know?

R. I heard grandfather bid him to.

Y. What did he bid him?

R. He bade Kala that he should tell father to visit us.
[She can scarcely conceal her joy.]

Y. You heard grandfather say so?

R. I did, mother, grandfather said that he became old, and before he died he wanted to see his son again.

Y. Why! did he really say so?

R. He did.

Y. Oh you darling son, then you will see him too.

R. People say that he will be a Buddha.

Y. Yes my son, some say he will be a Buddha and others doubt it.

R. Mother, what is a Buddha?

Y. A Buddha is a man who has found the truth.

R. How does a man find the truth?

Y. By enlightenment. He must find out the cause of evil.

R. Why must he find out the cause of evil?

Y. He teaches the people how to avoid evil.

R. Has father found the cause of evil?

Y. Kala Udayin says he has.

R. What is the cause of evil?

Y. Father says that selfishness is the cause of evil and selfishness comes from the belief in self.

R. Self?

Y. Yes, self! Man, as a rule, believes that he is a self.

R. What? A self?

Y. Yes, a being by himself, who lives only for himself, and the thought of self makes him selfish; and selfishness begets all evils.

R. [with a childlike serious conviction] I believe it, mother.

Y. Father says there is no self, that self is an illusion.

R. What does that mean?

Y. It means that we are no separate beings. I think a thought and speak it out and you hear it. I believe in that thought and so do you. Whose is it then, yours or mine?

R. It belongs to both.

Y. But where does the thought come from? If it is true it belongs to the truth, and it was true before I thought it.

R. Yes mother.

Y. And if it was wrong, it is evil, and it was evil before we thought it.

R. Yes mother.

Y. And so are all our thoughts, but almost everybody assumes that his self thinks these thoughts and invents them; and that is an illusion.

R. I see.

Y. [to herself] His eyes close. He is tired. [to Rahula] Now go to sleep again Rahula, and dream of your father. I will sing you one of father's songs.

[Yasodhara lays R. down in the high bed and sings]:

By ourselves is evil done,
 By ourselves we pain endure.
 By ourselves we cease from wrong,
 By ourselves become we pure.
 No one saves us but ourselves,
 No one can and no one may.
 We ourselves must walk the path,
 Buddhas merely teach the way.

[The boy sleeps. Then Yasodhara herself lies down on the mat on the floor. Above her appears the vision of her dream. Under the Bodhi tree in a forest landscape Siddhattha sits. He is surrounded by a halo of light. Mara approaches to tempt him.]

M. Thou art ahungered, worthy Sakyamuni,
 Ahungered art thou from continued fasts,
 And thou wilt starve unless thou take and eat.
 I bring delicious food, take, eat and live.

B. I shall not eat until my quest be done.
 Much better 't is to die in glorious battle
 Than flee and lead a coward's life, defeated.
 I shall not eat, O Mara, take thee hence.

M. Wilt thou not listen to my good advice?

B. The tempter always calls his councils good,
 But pleasures which he promises are evil.

M. I will not suffer thee to stay, Siddhattha,
 And shall disturb thy daring quest of truth.
 I'll split the Bodhi tree by lightening
 And frighten thee away with rumbling thunder.

[All is wrapped in darkness, except Siddhattha and the Bodhi tree. Thunder and lightning. After a while the noise abates. It grows light again. Mara's daughters appear.]

M. Go forth my daughters, tempt the holy man,
 And lure him from the seat of Buddhahood.

[Three graceful women, Mara's daughters, sing in a low enticing voice.]

[Melody: The Mermaids' Song from Weber's Oberon.]

Sweetest on earth 't is in pleasure to live,
 Love thou must ask for, and love thou must give.
 Pain we can soothe and assuage every smart,
 Yea, we will grant thee the wish of thy heart.
 Power bestow we, enjoyment and mirth,
 Health and wealth also, and all that has worth.
 Lo, of life's happiness naught shalt thou miss,
 Satisfied longings are greatest of bliss.

[While they sing they circle around the Bodhi tree and pose in graceful attitudes.]

[Siddhattha does not mind Mara's daughters. They withdraw, and grotesque monsters appear in threatening attitudes, exhibiting a savage war dance, always approaching the tree and turning their weapons against the Sakyamuni, but as soon as they approach the halo they droop, unable to hurt him. Lotus flowers rain down. Sakyamuni raises his right hand. A flash of lightning and a sudden clap of thunder. The spook vanishes in darkness while the Buddha under the Bodhi tree alone remains visible in a halo of light. The forest landscape reappears in full light as before.]

B. The wheel of life turns round through birth and death,

Its twelve-linked chain of causes takes its start

In ignorance and ends in suffering.

The truth is found, the fourfold noble truth;

All life is sorrow, sorrow's cause is lust,

But from our sorrow we can find escape

If we abandon lust and thought of self.

The eightfold noble path of righteousness

Delivers from all evil: it will bring

Sweet peace of mind and leadeth to Nirvana.

[With music accompaniment.]

Through many births I sought in vain

The builder of this house of pain.

Now, builder, thee I plainly see!

This is the last abode for me.

Thy gable's yoke, thy rafters broke,

My heart has peace; all lust will cease.

[The following words fit exactly the music of Haydn's Chorus with Soli No. 13* in The Creation, and the spirit of the composition is very appropriate for this scene.]

* Peters' Edition, pp. 44-55. "Die Himmel erzählen, etc." In a few places where the fugas set in, the words "The wicked Mara's host" should read "The wicked one's,—the wicked Mara's host" etc.

Chorus of Angels.

Behold the great muni,
 His heart unmoved by hatred,
 The wicked Mara's host
 'Gainst him did not prevail.

Trio of Brahma Vishnu Shiva.

Victorious Buddha
 Thou art wise and pure
 The darkness is gone
 And enlightenment gained.

[Chorus of Angels as above.]

Proclaim the truth
 To all the world.
 Truth will bring salvation.
 Glory to the truth!

[Chorus of Angels as above.]

[Lotus flowers rain down thicker and thicker, clouds cover the scene, but the Buddha under the Bodhi tree remains still dimly but sufficiently visible.]

[Yasodhara wakes up. She rises and lights a candle from a rush lamp. She kneels with clasped hands before the vision of the Buddha.]

Y. Oh Siddhattha, my Lord and Husband, no longer my Husband, but the Buddha. In thee I take my refuge. In thee and thy word, I believe. Thy doctrine shall guide me. Accept me as thy faithful disciple, a disciple of the Buddha, my Lord, the Tathagata, the great thinker, the Saviour of mankind.

[Curtain.]

SECOND INTERLUDE.

Living pictures accompanied by appropriate music to introduce the Third Act.

1. THE FOUNDATION OF THE KINGDOM OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Buddha preaches to his five disciples the way of salvation, which speech, preserved in a special book, is frequently compared to Christ's Sermon on the Mount.

Buddha stands with raised hand, while five monks stand or sit or squat round him in devout attitude.

2. ENTERING THE CAPITAL.

When Buddha came to Rajagaha, the people met him on the way and accompanied him into the city in triumphal procession which is analogous to Christ's entry into Jerusalem.

The Buddha with bowl in one hand and staff in the other is followed by yellow-robed monks. The people strew flowers, carry palm branches and wave kerchiefs.

3. THE COURTESAN.

Ambapali, the Buddhist Mary Magdalen, came to Buddha, worshiping him and invited him to take his meal at her home. To the astonishment of several moralists, he accepted and honored the penitent sinner.

A beautifully dressed woman with clasped hands kneels before Buddha, a maid in attendance behind her. Some well dressed people of high caste watch the scene with an expression of indignation.

4. THE PHILANTHROPIST.

The wealthiest man of Savatthi invites the Buddha to his home and offers to build a resthouse for the Buddha and his brotherhood.

Anatha Pindika kneels before the Buddha, holding in one hand the picture and plan of a building. Buddha indicates by his lowered hand acceptance of the gift. Buddha attended by two monks, Anatha Pindika accompanied by the architect.

5. PRINCE JETA.

It is told that the most beautiful spot in Savatthi was the royal park of Prince Jeta, which Anatha Pindika wanted to buy for the brotherhood of Buddha. The owner was unwilling to sell and made the exorbitant demand to have the whole ground covered with gold as its price. But Anatha Pindika had the gold carried to the garden and paid the price.

The scene is laid in the garden. Anatha Pindika with bags of gold stands in commanding attitude. His servants spread the coins while Prince Jeta throws up his hands in astonishment.

सब्वपापस्स अकरणं बुधलस्स उपसम्पदा ।
सच्चित्तपरियोदपनं एतं बुद्धानसासनं ॥५॥

ACT III.

FIRST SCENE.

[Bimbisara's court at Rajagaha.]

[Present: King BIMBISARA (Bb), VISAKHA (V), and NAGADEVA (N).]

V. The Sakyas will make a hard fight, great King, and the war will cost blood. These northern settlers are taller and stronger than other races and possess the courage of the inhabitants of their former frigid homes. It would be easier to take possession of their state if I married Princess Yasodhara and gradually assumed the government under your protection. Your mighty friendship would support me on the throne and you could rule through me.

Bb. That sounds acceptable, but in the mean time, I prepare for war.

V. Even in war I shall be of service to you. I can lead your army where it will not meet with resistance, and I know the names of those who are dissatisfied. Many could be induced to join your forces; and I can betray the very person of the raja into your hands.

Bb. [nodding kindly to V., then turning to N.] Is our army in readiness?

N. Great King, it is. There are thirty thousand men with more than a hundred war elephants garrisoned in Rajagaha alone, and twenty thousand more can be quickly centered on the frontier. There are another fifty thousand within call to make a sudden dash upon any one of our neighbors. Our treasury is well filled, and the people of Magadha are prosperous. We could stand even a protracted war far better than any other state of India.

Bb. The time seems favorable; the risk is small, and the spoil will be great. Convene my generals in the assembly hall.

[They bow low and pass out. Ambapali (Ap.) enters.]

Ap. Are they gone, my Lord, and what did you decide?

Bb. I propose to go to war.

Ap. You are rightly called "the Warlike."

Bb. I want to round off my kingdom and expand my power northward until it reaches the Himalayas.

Ap. The gods will speed you and the blessings of the saints shall be upon your people.

[Servant enters.]

St. There is a holy man who wants to see your Highness. His name is Devadatta.

Bb. Show him in. [Servant exit.]

Ap. Is he not one of the disciples of the Buddha?

Bb. I believe he is. [Ap. retires.]

[Devadatta enters]

Dd. Hail, great King! Protector of religion and victor of many battles!

Bb. What brings you to my presence? I always rejoice to see holy men. Their coming is auspicious, and I am happy to be of service to them.

Dd. Great King, I implore your assistance for the brotherhood which I have founded. We need your royal support and the holiness of our lives will surround you as a halo with heavenly protection.

Bb. Are you not a disciple of Gotama, who is called the Buddha?

Dd. No longer, mighty King, I was his disciple so long as I believed in him; but he is not holy. I have abandoned him. He is not austere; his disciples do not practice self-mortifications, and he speaks kindly and dines with sinners. My disciples do not dress in worldly garments; they would not accept the invitation of women; they would not touch animal food. He who calls himself the Buddha is unworthy of that high title; he is a pretender who has not reached the highest goal. My rules are much more strict than his, and my brotherhood alone is holy.

Bb. Holiness is a mighty thing.

Dd. Yea, and our vows will shield your government, your throne, your army and your people against any misfortune.

Bm. I shall send my treasurer to investigate and will do what is right.

Dd. Maharaja, be assured of my deepest gratitude.

[Bows low, exit.]

Ap. [reenters, excited] My royal friend, do not trust that man [pointing toward the door where Dd. went out]. He is false. He may be holy, but he is treacherous. He may be virtuous; he may shun joy and the blessings of life, he may practice all penances, he may torture and mortify his body. But there is no true goodwill in him. His holiness is egotistic, and his religion is hypocrisy. Support his brotherhood with money or gifts as you see fit, but do not believe what he says about the Buddha.

Bb. [With an inquiring look] Why?

Ap. I know what he meant when he scoffed at him. When the Buddha stayed at Vesali, I invited that noblest of all monks to take his meal with me. I am not holy; I am a worldly woman; I am not a saint; but I have a warm heart, I feel for others and I want to do what is right. When I heard that the Buddha stayed in the mango grove, I thought to myself, I will go and see him. If he is truly allwise, he will judge my heart and he will judge me in mercy. He will know my needs and will not refuse me. I went to the mango grove, and he looked upon me with compassion; he accepted my invitation in the presence of witnesses, openly, fearlessly, and in kindness. There were the proud Licchavi princes, and close to him stood the envious Devadatta. How they scowled; how they condemned the great and kindly saint! How they whispered, "Shame on him!" and I saw how they despised me—yet they did not dare to speak out or to censure him publicly. Then, my gracious King, I knew that he was truly the Lord Buddha, the Allwise.

Bb. My dear friend, I accept every word you say as true. I know the goodness of your heart, I know your worth, your loving kindness, and if you were of royal birth you would be worthy to wear a crown. The Buddha did not demean himself when he honored you.

Ap. Allow me one question. Did the Buddha ever beg you to support his brotherhood?

Bb. No, he did not; but I will give him all the assistance he may need.

Ap. Did he ever offer you the support of his vows, or did he ever praise the efficacy of his holiness?

Bb. He never did.

Ap. Neither does he stand in need of self-recommendation, for his very presence is a blessing, because he spreads goodwill and kindness, and the people who hear him are ashamed of doing anything unrighteous. Devadatta extends to you the promise, if you but support his disciples, of an unconditional protection through his holiness. The Buddha's protection is not so cheaply earned. I heard him say that every one must protect himself by his own righteousness, and no prayer, no sacrifice, no religious devotion, nor even penance or fasts could protect a man from the wrongs which he does.

Bb. The Buddha's presence would be more auspicious than ten Devadattas.

Ap. Oh, most assuredly! And what a contempt I have for the virtuous indignation of men who, overmoral themselves, judge haughtily of others; yet, if you look into their souls you discover that they are heartless and self-seeking villains.

Bb. Your judgment is well grounded.

Ap. The Buddha alone possesses greatness, and the Buddha does not seek honor, but the people adore him.

Bb. Rajagaha must become the center of India. I will send for the Buddha and invite him to visit me. His sojourn here will make the kingdom of Magadha more famous than conquests and victories.

[The servant enters.]

St. Mighty King, the prime minister Nagadeva.

Bb. He is welcome. Fare thee well, sweet heart; affairs of state call me.

N. Mighty King, the generals are assembled. They hail thee as their war lord, and are anxious for laurels, for glory, for booty!

[Trumpets, Curtain.]

THIRD INTERLUDE.

Living pictures accompanied by appropriate music.

1. SENDING OUT THE DISCIPLES.

The Buddha called his disciples together, and having ordained them, bade them spread the Gospel, with these words translated from the Buddhist Canon:

“Go ye now, O disciples, and wander forth for the benefit of the many, for the welfare of mankind, out of compassion for the world. Preach the doctrine which is glorious in the beginning, glorious in the middle, and glorious in the end, in the spirit as well as in the letter. There are beings whose eyes are scarcely covered with dust, but if the doctrine is not preached to them they cannot attain salvation. Proclaim to them a life of holiness. They will understand the doctrine and accept it.”

The Pali expression kalyamo dhamma is here translated “glorious doctrine.” The dictionary defines the first word as “excellent, beautiful, glorious.” This closely corresponds to the Christian term, which, as derived from the Greek, reads “evangel” and in its Saxon equivalent “gospel” or “good tidings.”

2. THE RICH YOUTH.

Yasa, the son of a wealthy nobleman of Benares, came by night to the Blessed One and exclaimed: “What misery!” But the Buddha answered, “There is no misery for him who has entered the Path.”

Yasa, richly dressed, with an expression of distress, before the Buddha who comforts him. The scene is framed in darkness, the two figures being lit up by a torch.

3. THE WANDERER.

The Buddha was in the habit of wandering through the country from place to place.

The picture shows him with a staff in his right hand and a bowl in his left in an Indian landscape.

4. A CHILD'S OFFERING.

Old frescoes in the Ajanta Caves show a mother sending a gift through her child. It looks as if they were Buddhist illustrations of Christ's injunction, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

SECOND SCENE.

[A room in the Jetavana. The wheel of the law pictured on one side and the wheel of becoming on the other. Otherwise swastikas and lotus flowers serve as ornaments. A large opening exhibits a view into a garden with running water. On the right side there is a platform with low seats, on the other there is a low table with a divan, on which Anatha Pindika is seated, looking over palmleaf manuscripts.]

[Present: ANATHA PINDIKA (A); Servant (St.); Prince JETA (J); later on KALA UDAYIN (K) and the BUDDHA (B).]

[A servant enters.]

St. His Highness the Prince Jeta.

A. Show him in. [JETA enters. A. rises to meet him with bows.] You are most welcome, my Prince.

J. I have come from my brother, the King, to express to you his thanks for having bought my pleasure grounds for the noble and great purpose of affording a worthy resthouse to the Buddha and his brotherhood.

A. Kindly tender my gratitude to your royal brother for his gracious message.

J. I hear that King Bimbisara has sent an embassy to the Buddha to induce him to come back to Rajagaha. Has the Buddha received these men?

A. Not yet. He will see them this morning.

J. We ought to keep him here. He is a wonderful man, and I consider our city fortunate to have him reside with us. What astonishes me is his way of conquering the hearts of all men, even of his opponents, and he is so sensible.

A. What do you mean?

J. I am not a religious man ; I am too worldly, but him I would follow.

A. Why?

J. He is perhaps the only religious reformer who does not go to extremes. He rejects on the one hand austerities, self-mortifications, penances, and severe fasts as useless, and on the other hand, he would not allow his followers to indulge in pleasures ; but he insists most sensibly on keeping between the two extremes and proclaims the middle path of leading a righteous life. There is nothing absurd about him. Think of Devadatta. He insists that the monks should dress in rags picked up in cemeteries. The Buddha appeals to common sense, and therefore I say, he is a wonderful man.

A. He is more than a man ; he is enlightenment incarnate. A stream of blessings goes out from him.

J. He has grown into an international power, and kings do well not to ignore his influence.

A. I think so myself, and I am so glad that his influence is always for good, never for evil, and his ways are so marvelously gentle.

J. Indeed that is a blessing. If he were not so absolutely indifferent to his own affairs he might become positively dangerous. His lay disciples count in thousands of thousands. The farmers in the country, the merchants in the towns, the lawyers, the artisans, and even the soldiers believe in him. Lately General Siha became a lay member of the Buddha's brotherhood, and many other prominent officers followed his example.

- A.* He would never have gained this influence if he were not truly the Buddha.
- J.* I want to tell you that a war is threatening, but please do not speak of it, it is a deep secret. A spy in the secret service of my royal father has found out that King Bimbisara intends to fall upon the Sakyas and deprive them of their independence. The Brahman Visakha, minister of state, has turned traitor and promises to deliver his country into the hands of King Bimbisara on the condition that he be made Raja in Suddhodana's place.
- A.* The country of the Sakyas is but small, and their independence will not last long; it is a mere question of time.
- J.* But consider that the Buddha hails from Kapilavasthu. He is the son of Suddhodana, the Sakya raja.
- A.* Indeed he is and may I be permitted to inform him of the danger that threatens his father's house?
- J.* I give you full liberty, for he will use discretion and not betray his informant. I deem Bimbisara's plan dangerous to himself. A war with the Sakyas may cost Bimbisara his throne, for the people of Rajagaha believe in the Buddha, and I learn that even now the war rumors have made them restless.

[Servant (St.) enters.]

St. Here is a man with the name Kala Udayin, who has a message for the Blessed One.

A. Show him in.

J. I leave you now and hope that you will keep the Buddha as long as possible in Savatthi. [Exit.]

[Kala Udayin enters and bows to A.]

A. You want to see the Blessed One? I will call him.

[A. exit.]

K. [Alone] This is the place where Prince Siddhattha lives! Indeed a most delightful spot and more pleasant than many a royal palace. And how the people speak of him! They call him the Blessed One, the Buddha, the Tathagata, the Sakyamuni, the great Sage. The wealthiest man of Kosala has bought these extensive and most beautiful grounds and presented them to the brotherhood of his disciples, so that the Buddha would stay here from time to time, and that the people of the city would have him for their guest.

[Buddha accompanied by A. comes in. He is followed by two disciples. The Buddha sits down on the seat on the platform, having on either hand one of his disciples. A. stands below with clasped hands.]

[K. sinks to his knees with clasped hands.]

B. My friend, what brings you here?

K. A message from your royal father: He bade me tell you that he is growing old, and before he dies, he wants to see his son once more. Would you deign to accept his invitation?

- B.* Tell me, my friend, how is my father? Is old age truly telling on him?
- K.* Not yet so visibly, but he worries much.
- B.* And how is Rahula? He is now seven years old and must be quite a boy.
- K.* He is, my Lord; and how he talks of his father. He knows everything you are doing.
- B.* Who tells him?
- K.* His mother does.
- B.* And tell me how the princess fares?
- K.* She imposes upon herself the observances which the mendicant friars keep. She will have no preference over him who once was her husband. She sleeps on the floor, she does no longer use unguents or perfumes. She wears a simple yellow robe and observes the regulation of the brotherhood in taking food.
- [B. nods and with a distant look sits a few moments in silence.]
- B.* And she is a good mother?
- K.* There could be no better.
- Servant* [anounces] An embassy of the most potent King of Magadha, the great Bimbisara.
- B.* [addressing himself to the servant] Let them come in. [turning to K.] Kala Udayin, bring My father greetings, and say that I shall come.
- [Kala Udayin exit.]
- [A number of men, the embassy of King Bimbisara, led by Nagadeva, most gorgeously dressed, file in. They let themselves down on one knee, clasp their hands and rise again.]

- N. Most gracious Lord, all-wise and blessed Buddha,
 Our noble sov'reign bids me tender you
 His most respectful greetings, and he hopes
 That you return and visit Rajagaha,
 For he is very anxious to be honored
 By your auspicious presence in his kingdom.
- B. My Lords, express to your most mighty King
 That the Tathagata can not accept
 This friendly invitation, for he will Start for his home, the country of the Sakyas,
 To see his aged father and his kin.
 If war or other ills befall his people,
 He wants to live, if need be, die with them.
- N. Lord Buddha, speak a word of truth to us,
 For I'm aware thou art omniscient.
 Our royal master wants to hear from thee.
- B. All bodily existence passeth by
 For it is compound and will be dissolved;
 But there is Law; it is the Uncreate,
 It is th' Etern, which is without beginning
 And without end. That must our refuge be.
 He who relies on the Impermanent,
 And, being strong, attempts to crush the weak,
 Will soon break down. This is the law of deeds,
 For as we sow, such will our harvest be.
 Rely on Truth, the Uncreate, th' Etern,
 Be guided by the rule of Righteousness.

This is my message to the King, your Lord,
 And may he be advised to rule his country
 With love of peace, with goodness, and with wisdom.

My blessing be on him and on his people.

[They kneel, clasp their hands, circumambulate the Buddha and file out.]

[Jeta returns in excitement.]

J. The war is on! King Bimbisara's army
 Is building bridges to attack the Sakyas.

[Curtain. Trumpet signals, military music.]

FOURTH INTERLUDE.

Living Pictures Accompanied by Appropriate Music.

1. KING BIMBISARA ON THE ROYAL ELEPHANT.

The king is seated under a canopy, together with his minister and field marshal. On the head of the elephant, the driver; and retinue on either side.

2. KING BIMBISARA IN CAMP.

Standing before the royal tent he addresses his generals.

3-5. GROUPS OF SOLDIERS. Horsemen, foot soldiers, archers, bridge-builders and engineers.

Finally: THE ARMY ON THE MARCH.

THIRD SCENE.

[Reception hall of the Raja Suddhodana; Indian pompous style; columns and beyond an outlook into a tropical palm-garden. Seats scattered through the room. On the left a compartment, open toward the audience, is separated from the main room by hanging carpets.]

[*Near the right side Suddhodana is seated with Pajapati and Yasodhara. Rahula in the background
 (viz., in the garden) in the care of a nurse.*]

S. The time is troublesome, and it appears
That war is imminent.

P. Oh do not fret;
Visakha is a cunning diplomat:
I hope he'll be successful, and he will Persuade King Bimbisara to keep peace.

S. I do hope too, but hope against conviction.

[Visakha and Devala enter.]

There come the Brahman and the gallant Captain.

V. [Kneeling on one foot to the King] Hail Maharaja!

D. Hail, my gracious King.

S. Welcome my worthy messengers!

[They kneel to Pajapati.]

P. Be welcome.

S. Tell me at once, how did your mission speed?

V. There is a subtle influence against you
At Bimbisara's court; there is a party
Bound to have war, and they will have it too,
Unless we meet them by diplomacy.
Leave it to me, and I'll preserve the peace.

S. Had not my son turned mendicant, how useful
Could he at present be! I need a general,
A trusty man of youthful strength and courage
To take the helm and lead the ship of state
Through storm and danger, for our foes are strong.

V. Great Raja, I am privy to your grief,
I know the hope you'd set upon Siddhattha.
What brilliant gifts the boy inherited,

From you, his royal father, and how he,
 Forgetful of his filial duty, left you,
 And his fair wife and child, to turn a beggar.

- S. All this is true, remind me not of it,
 'T is a disgrace to our most royal house,
 And all the Rajas in the Indian land,
 Will point to us and mock the Sakya tribe.

[Rahula comes in with childlike joy and brings his mother a rose.]

- R. Here, mother, is a rose. I picked it from the bush where the nightingale sings. I thought, if father had been here, he would have brought the rose to you. He loves flowers and so do you.

Y. My darling!

- S. [with a touch of anger] Yasodhara, I wish, you would not speak to him too much of his father.

- R. Why should mother not mention father? I love him and I should know all about him. I want to join the Buddha's brotherhood.

- S. Do you love him more than your grandfather?

- R. I love my grandfather too, I love mother, and you, dear grandmother [turning to Pajapati]. You are always so kind to me. I love you all. But father
 I love in a different manner. I love him as Buddha.
 I clasp my hands to him as to a god; and so do you mother, do you not?

Y. [puts her hand on R.'s mouth] Hush!

I thank you for the rose, my child; now run away and bring another rose to grandfather, and one for your grandmother Pajapati.

- R. Yes mother, and one I keep for father when he comes. [Runs off.]
- V. Your grandson needs a father, Maha Raja!
And let me tender you my humble service.
I see Yasodhara, the noble princess,
Pine patiently away and spend in mourning
Her life's best years of youth and happiness.
She has been cruelly deserted, has
Been widowed by Siddhattha for a whim.
Give her to me in marriage, and I'll prove
A better father than that runaway,
A better father to your little grandson,
A better husband to his widowed wife.
- S. You are at liberty to ask my daughter.
- V. Fair Princess, cease to mourn, and grant my suit.
Thou shalt see better days than heretofore.
- Y. I pledged my troth to Gotama Siddhattha,
And I shall never break my faith to him.
- V. Siddhatta is no more, he has turned monk
And you are free, you are Siddhattha's widow.
- S. My daughter, do not think that I oppose
Visakha's suit, for on the contrary
I do support it, and I wish you would Accept him as a husband, for I need
Alliance with a brave and trusty man.
- V. Princess Yasodhara, here is my hand,
Do not refuse me.
- Y. Brahman, spare your words.

V. The time will come when you will sore regret.
 O King, compel her to obey ; make use
 Of your good right as master of this house,
 For I alone can save the Sakya state.

P. O worthy Brahman, do not threaten us.

V. Decide, O Maharaja ; thou art Lord !
 Thy bidding must be done. Shall women rule,
 Or art thou master still in thine own home ?

S. I am the master here ; but not a tyrant ;
 Among our people master means a leader.
 The Sakya yeomen justly pride themselves
 On their free institutions. I'm the first
 Among them, not an autocrat nor despot ;
 I serve them as adviser, guide and father ;
 Shall I who never would infringe upon
 The right of any poorest peasant woman,
 Compel a princess of the royal house
 To marry 'gainst her will ? No sir, not I.
 I wished the Princess to accept your suit,
 But I shall never say, She must be yours.

V. King of the Sakyas, you forget yourself,
 I am a Brahman and of noble birth.
 I served you faithfully for many years,
 But now I quit your service, for I know
 That Bimbisara, King of Magada,
 The mightiest of Indian rulers,
 Will welcome me as friend and counselor.

[He bows to the King and Pajapati, and leaves. For a moment they are all silent.]

S. I fear me that means war.

- D. Indeed it does.
 If you remember, King, Visakha said
 There was a subtle influence against you
 At Bimbisara's court. It dawns on me
 That he, Visakha, is the cause of it.
 I saw him whisper with a courtier, then
 He spoke in secret with a general,
 And with the King too he was closeted.
 The hypocrite has thrown away his mask,
 And since he spoke out boldly, I know now
 That he has been intriguing all the time.
- S. He thinks I hate my son, but I do not.
 I'm only angry, I am disappointed,
 Because he did not heed my dearest wish.
 I love him still and I invited him
 To visit his old home and me, his father.
 I sent Udayin with a kindly greeting.
 Oh, I'd forgive him all, and e'en his flight,
 Had only he not turned a mendicant.
 It hurts my pride to see a Sakya prince,
 And mine own son, go round from house to house
 With bowl in hand to beg his daily food.
- [Rahula comes in excited.]*
- R. Grandfather, here is your rose, and grandma, here is yours. And oh! did you hear the news?
- Y. What is it, boy? Why are you so excited?
- P. Who told you any news?
- R. The guards at the gate. They say that my father has come. All the people rush out of their houses and greet him with clasped hands. They strew flowers on the road and hail him as the Buddha!

Y. [rises] Why, is it possible? [Wants to retire.]

S. Stay here. Kala Udayin comes.

[Kala enter and kneels.]

K. I bow in humble reverence before the King.

And my respectful salutations to all the members of the royal house [turning to Gopa] and to you.

S. Bring you good news, Udayin?

K. Your noble son, my King, is coming.

S. Where did you find him?

K. At the Jetavana at Savatthi.

S. What kind of a place is that?

K. It is the most wonderful pleasure park I ever saw.

O King, your garden here is a paltry affair in comparison with the Jetavana.

S. There he lives in luxury?

K. Oh no Sir. Not at all. He could live in luxury, if he wanted to, but he leads a simple life, as simple as the humblest servant in your home, and when he wanders through the country after the rainy season he lives like any mendicant friar. He overtook me on my way, and when he came hither to Kapilavattu, his home, he did as usual. Last night he slept in the forest, and this morning he went from house to house with bowl in hand, begging his food, and he spoke a blessing wherever people greeted him kindly, or gave him to eat.

S. Oh my son, my son! Why didst thou not go straight to the palace where thy father has food enough for thee and all thy disciples!

- K. He always follows the rule of the mendicants.
- S. Oh my son! Why dost thou shame thy father in his own home?
- K. The Blessed One deems it no shame to beg. He is as modest as a pauper and shows no pride, but wherever he comes, he is greeted like a king, nay like a king of kings, and the wealthiest and most powerful rulers come to do him reverence.
- S. And he is here, this wonderful man? And he is my son Siddhatha?
- K. Yes, he is here, and it is your son, but no longer Siddhattha, the Sakya prince, but Sakya muni, the sage of the Sakyas, the Buddha, the Blessed One. When I spoke to him and gave him your message, he inquired for you and the Queen Pajapati [Yasodhara rises] and for you, most honored Princess and for Rahula. Yes, he inquired for you, and how Rahula had grown.
- Y. Did he speak kindly of us?
- K. He always speaks kindly, and he is always calm.
[Music: a song, Buddhist Doxology, at a distance.]
- K. O listen to the music. Here he comes, the glorious Buddha. He must be at the gate.
- Y. [rises again and withdraws.] I must be gone.
- P. Oh stay, Yasodhara.
- Y. No I will hide me from his very sight; and if I am to him of any value, he will ask for me.
- S. Stay, Yasodhara.

Y. He fled from me because I was a hindrance
In his great quest, and he may shun me still.

S. Stay none the less.

P. Nay, let her withdraw, she is in tears and would break down.

[Y. and P. withdraw to the partition behind the curtains.]

S. You say, that my son is greeted even by kings with clasped hands?

K. Yea, even kings kneel to him.

S. I shall do nothing of the kind. He is my son, my disobedient son, and I am still his father. [P. returns.]

[The procession of the Buddha comes. Two monks precede and stand at either side of the Buddha. Accompanying monks and other public come into the garden, crowding up to the columns. They all kneel with clasped hands except S.]

B. My blessing to this house, to you, O King,
And also to the Queen Pajapati,
My dear good aunt and loving foster mother.

S. At last thou comest back, my wayward son,
But why didst shame me? Why didst thou go begging
Here in my capital? Thou art descended
From ancestors who are a royal race.

B. My ancestors are Buddhas of past ages,
Their thinking has descended unto me,
Their habits and their rules of life I follow,
And not the regulations of a court.

[The people rise to their feet again; Kala joins Gopa.]

S. Tell me, what are the rules of former Buddhas?

B. They greet you with a stanza in return
For any food or hospitality.

S. I shall be glad to hear what you will say.

B. Awake from sleep, dispel the dream ;
Before the truth's bright ray
Things truly are not what they seem
But truth points out the way.
Truth, truth alone will bring you bliss,
In the next life and e'en in this.

[Rahula brings a rose to Buddha.]

R. Here father, is a rose I saved for you
On the big bush where nests the nightingale.

B. And this is Rahula! How you have grown!
Where is your mother?

S. Yasodhara was here,
But would not stay. On hearing that you came
She left the room and said that if at all
You cared for her, you would not fail to ask.

B. I want to see her, lead me to the place.

[B. hands his bowl to the King, Pajapati rises and leads the way. At a distance a flourish of trumpets.]

D. What military signals do I hear?

S. Go, Captain Devala, see what it means.

[D. exit. S. hands the bowl to one of the disciples.]

B. Ye two disciples shall attend the meeting.
Above all passion has the Buddha risen,

But he will comfort her who loves him dearly.
 The Princess' heart is filled with deepest grief,
 And in no wise shall any one rebuke her
 In whatsoever way she greeteth him.

[P. opens the curtain leading to the apartment where Y. sits. B. P. and S. enter. Y. sinks down before him and holds his feet, weeping. The flourish of trumpets is repeated.]

S. [grows restless, turns to P.] These warlike trumpets have a foreign sound
 And may forbode the enemy's attack.

[He leaves the apartment where Y. is and reenters the hall, going toward the entrance in the background between the columns.]

B. Yasodhara, I bring thee happy tidings,
 Deliverance is found, let go thy grief.

[Y. looking up to B. with deep emotion.]

Y. Oh Lord, how did I long for your return,
 But in your eyes I have become as naught.

B. My faithful helpmate and my former wife,
 Thou hast been dear to me, dear art thou still,
 But truth is dearer, and to truth I cling,
 While on my quest of truth in former lives,
 And also now in this existence, thou
 With voluntary sacrifice hast aided me,
 Imagine not that thou a hindrance art
 To me or to my work and holy mission.
 Next to my sainted mother thou art blessed
 Among the women of this world. Rejoice
 And let all grief pass from thy suffering soul.

[A flourish of trumpets, this time near by and loud. Devala returns.]

D. My noble liege, an embassy is coming
From Bimbisara, King of Magadha.
They are the kingdom's highest ministers,
And sullen do they look and their retainers.

S. 'T is most unfortunate, but let them in.

[In the meantime the Buddha places his right hand in blessing on Y.'s head; then one of his attendants helps her up. The embassy files in as before at the Jetavana. The Prime Minister Nagadeva (N) addresses King S.]

N. Oh Maharaja, listen to our message!
The ruler of the mighty Magadha,
King Bimbisara, sends you kindly greetings.
He wants you to entreat the Blessed One,
The holy Buddha, who now stays with you,
Who, as he learneth, is your noble son,
To come to Rajagaha on a visit.
There have been rumors of intended war,
But be assured, our noble King means peace.
He would not draw the sword against your state,
Nor wage a war against the Buddha's father.

[The Buddha enters.]

S. Oh noble son, oh blessed, highest Buddha,
Thou art indeed a King of Kings on earth!

[He kneels down. All members of the embassy do the same.]

No crown thou wear'st, no scepter's in thy hand,
Thou needest neither lance, nor sword nor shield,

And yet thou rulest, with mere word and thought,
Thou sway'st the destinies of all the world.
I did not know thy power and thy great worth ;
But now I bow me down in humble faith,
And I take refuge in the truth thou preachest.
Henceforth I will devote myself to spread
The kingdom of good will and righteousness.

[Music: Buddhist Doxology.]

[Curtain.]

134221777F

RETURN TO →

CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT

202 Main Library

642-3403

LOAN PERIOD 1

2

3

HOME USE

4

5

6

ALL BOOKS MAY BE RECALLED AFTER 7 DAYS

1-month loans may be renewed by calling 642-3405

6-month loans may be recharged by bringing books to Circulation D.

Renewals and recharges may be made 4 days prior to due date

DUE AS STAMPED BELOW

SEP 14 1976 1 4

SEP 23 1982

RECEIVED BY

SEP 23 1982

CIRCULATION DEPT.

GAYLORD

BROS., INC.

Manufacturers

Syracuse, N. Y.

Stockton, Calif.

